See Mom Shiver... What Fun

My children for some unfathomable reason love to see their mother frightened. I suppose if I were to analyze the situation, which I am not about to do, I would probably discover that their pleasure derives from the realization that Mother, who has been the cause of some of their most frightening moments, is finally getting what is coming to her.

An out and out coward with a fecund imagination I have afforded them great diversion over the years. In a few areas I am a disappointment to these rascals, being unafraid of big dogs, medium-sized spiders and little snakes. In other realms they have been gratified beyond their wildest dreams. There is the matter of flying, for example. I am a white knuckler. The least turbulence and I grow pale. The buzz of the intercom system which signals the pilot is about to speak and I dive under the seat looking for a life jacket. Their father, ever the gentleman, tries to dissuade them of their convictions. I have a headache, he says, and they grin knowingly at me, sitting contorted and miserable. Niagara Falls, the Canadian side, is always one of their favorite places — as long as I am along to plead tearfully that they keep away from the rail which is much too low and much too close to the perilous, swirling white froth making its descent. A TV commercial in which a window washer high outside of a Manhattan skyscraper extolls a cleaning product has the effect of turning my stomach upside down. And contemplating how the George Washington Bridge or the Trade Center's twin towers were ever built sends me into palpitations. All of this delights my crew. At the end of a recent, rather spectacular, vacation, the youngsters returned to school, souvenirs in hand, to engage in show and tell sessions. The second grader, first off the bus coming home that afternoon, was interrogated as usual. "Did she enjoy being back at school?" "Did the kids like the candy she brought?" "What did they enjoy hearing about the museums, the outdoor restaurants, the canals?" "No, no," she grinned. "The part they liked best is how the taxi driver went so fast and you got so scared and squeezed my hand off."
