

The Ordination

At the Nov. 28, 1969, ordination of Bishop Hogan were Archbishop Raimondi, the apostolic delegate, and Bishop Lawrence B. Casey.

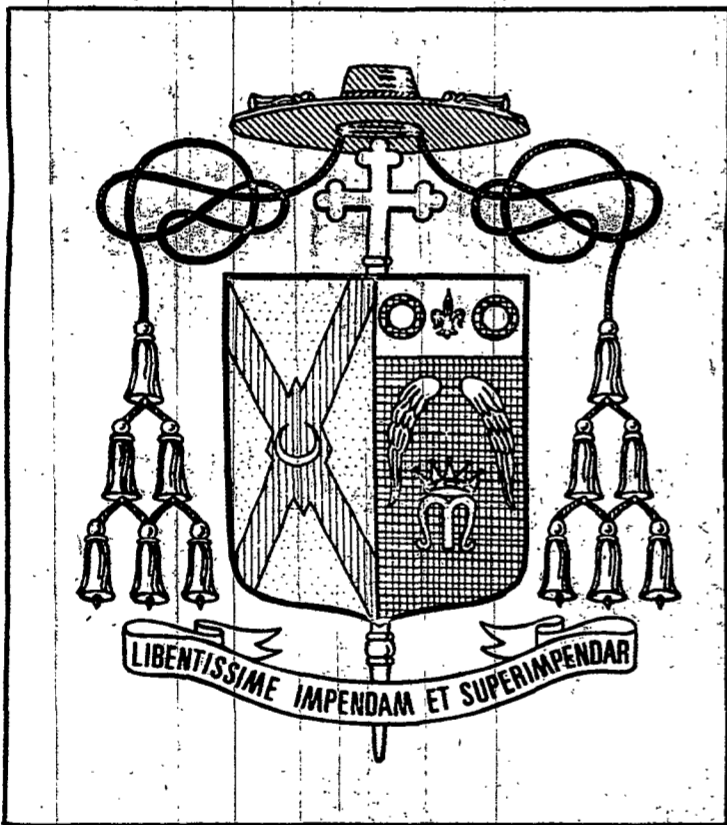

With Archbishop Raimondi and Cardinal Cooke.

Bishop Hickey extends the Sign of Peace.

Front row, Cardinal Cooke, Archbishop Raimondi, Bishop Hogan, Archbishop Sheen; rear, Bishops Hickey, Kearney, Casey and McCafferty.

Bishop Hogan's Coat of Arms

The left side of Bishop Joseph L. Hogan's shield displays the coat of arms of the Diocese of Rochester which were derived from the ancient See of Rochester, England. The red saltire (in the form of an X) on a silver background is called the cross of St. Patrick. It bears a crescent in its center, lunar symbol of Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception, patroness of the United States.

The right side is given to the personal coat of arms of Bishop Hogan. Presentation of the arms of the diocese on the same shield denotes the spiritual union of the bishop with his see.

The Hogan family arms from Ireland's County Tipperary are depicted as two black annuets (circles) at the top of the shield. A fleur-de-lis, the French form of the lily, honors St. Joseph, Bishop Hogan's baptismal patron.

The crowned monogram in the center of the right shield stands for the Blessed Virgin Mary and comes from the coat of arms of the late Bishop James E. Kearney. Mary is the baptismal name of Bishop Hogan's mother. The pair of angel's wings remind the viewer of St. Michael the Archangel, the baptismal patron of the bishop's father and brother.

The motto beneath the shield is taken from St. Paul's second Epistle to the Corinthians, and is translated as "Gladly will I spend and be spent."

Archbishop Sheen, Bishop Hogan, Archbishop Raimondi.

Cardinal Cooke.

