

Four-wheel drive vehicles are particularly appealing to outdoor sportsmen. The excellent traction, good ground clearance and large cargo space these vehicles commonly offer are all useful features for hunting and fishing trips.

Four-wheel drive . . . Is a 'must' for sportsmen

Four-wheel drive vehicles have been long-time favorites of hunters and fishermen.

All it takes is one week-end hunting trip spoiled by a road impassable to a two-wheel drive car or pickup to convince the sportsman of the traction advantages of four-wheel drive. Power at all four wheels makes a real difference when the going gets tough.

Four-wheel drive vehicles like the International Scouts are in a special category called "sports/utility vehicles" which means they are smaller and more maneuverable than full-size pickups.

They have special features which make them appropriate for hunting and fishing activities plus they have a versatility to furnish daily family transportation.

Fishermen might find sports/utility vehicles appealing because their short wheel bases give extra maneuverability to travel through backwoods trails to reach those isolated mountain streams.

They can tow boats weighing up to a hefty 5,000 lbs., and four-wheel drive with a two-speed transfer case that lets them tackle steep boat launch ramps with ease.

Inside, these vehicles have plenty of room for rods, reels, tackle boxes, and, of course, ice chests for all those fish.

Sports/utility vehicles let hunters carry two large dog crates, shotguns, food, and other gear way back to where the best game roams.

Bring along a travel trailer—they can tow up to 25-footers—for a base camp, then use the agility given by four-wheel drive for daily expeditions.

With overall widths of only 70 inches, these vehicles can squeeze their way through tight spots that stymie wider vehicles.

Sports/utility vehicles can really earn their keep on hunting, fishing or camping trips.
