

For 'lights out' time, take your own

In the dark of the night, the opinion poll may sway away from a man's dog being his best friend because light—or the lack of it—fast becomes a dependency factor which can result in the difference between convenient or impossible, rational actions or those born of fear.

Whether it be changing a flat tire alone on a deserted highway at 3 A.M. or finding your way into the camp at night through a stump-and-tree-infested creek channel, being prepared with the necessary device to light the night the way it needs to shouldn't be a problem in today's world.

Portable high-intensity lighting systems are readily available at most counters and should be a staple item when venturing to those places where the sun doesn't always shine all the time. And convenient they are—with a power source like a cigar lighter, a car battery, or a portable power pack that charges when you don't need it and provides electrical energy when you do.

"Light-up-the-night" portable lighting systems by one company—Brinkmann—feature candle power up to 300,000, can illuminate objects a mile away, and float, should they be dropped over the side of a boat. Some Q-Beam models by Brinkmann also have a "spot-flood" feature that converts the powerful spotlight into a wide angle flood light.

In addition to spot and flood light needs in the Great Outdoors or indoors, don't underestimate the versatility of outdoorsman-type fluorescent lighting units. They're perfect for lights-out power shortages, in the boat, on the patio, or at the campsite.

The needs for carry-along portable lighting systems are limited only by imagination. But one thing's for sure: if you don't have carry-along portable light, you can't use it. And a fist full of light when you need it may make the difference.

Portable lighting has its place in everyday life as well. Think about the last time you tried to find your way to a friend's new home in a new development tract, or how you wished for something stronger than a flashlight while you searched the driveway for that piece of jewelry that had dropped.

Setting up camp in the middle of the night can be easy and quick when you team up the family and a flick-of-the-switch portable lighting system.

Light and night go together when it comes to doing it easily and safely in the Great Outdoors.

EMBARKATION—A properly loaded canoe is unlikely to capsize. A cooler containing the major food supply, which is generally the heaviest item to be loaded, should be placed in the canoe just to the rear of center with other gear evenly placed around it. Once loaded, it's cast off and paddle away.
