Communicating in All Styles

By Joan M. Smith

On Wednesday, Feb. 11, the St. Agnes dance and drama students were treated to workshops and performances by the "Sunshine Too" professional acting group from the National Theater of the Institute of the Deaf (NTID), Rochester Institute of Technology.

Sr. Anne Patrice miming a haunted house.

It was an experience in entertainment as well as participation. The students were invited to become involved in the communication process through sign and body language. In the sign-song workshop, led by Ogden Whitehead and Joyce Cole, the girls learned hand signs, like touching the heart with a brush-up motion that signifies feeling, to put together in the song "Tomorrow" from the Broadway show "Annie."

Upstairs in room 304, students were involved in a sign-mime workshop led by Mitch Mahar and Ed Alletto. It was a study in body language and those who participated were given objects like barns, churches, mansions, and haunted houses, to describe through pantomime.

"Why do you study the arts if you're not going professional?" Mitch asked story-telling, scenes from plays, and entertaining examples of deaf experiences in a hearing world. All their productions are performed in both sign language and voice so hearing as well as deaf audiences can enjoy the show.

The group is a touring company and has traveled to Newfoundland, Canada, and throughout the Eastern starboard. According to Mitch, the company has performed over 300 shows since last October. Other members who performed at St. Agnes were Debbie Rennie and Peter Isquith.

Sister Anne Patrice Carrigan, head of the school's Fine Arts Department, brought the company to St. Agnes. The purpose, she said, was to make the girls aware of the many ways in which to communicate through the body movements in acting, dancing, mime, and theater games, and to show them how the hearing impaired person can function as an artist.
