Why do you think women swear?

NAZARETH

JEAN TOMASSO
Sophomore
theater

"First of all we've entered into men's dominion and have had to work by men's standards. It's like fighting fire with fire. Women will swear because of anger and because they hear it all the time. It's like everyday language — that is, some words. What I don't approve of is when every other word a person says is a swear word. It shows a lack of vocabulary."

KATHY FORAN
band

"I think they mainly do it as a shock element. I think they do it to impress friends and to create an image of toughness or authority. I don't like it; it's degrading to everyone, not just to the women. I don't think swearing is necessary for anyone. I don't know what can be done about it. It has progressed so far. Parents don't do anything about it when their kids swear."

CHERYL SHANK
Junior class vice president

"I think women swear to release the frustration and because everyone is doing it. The female needs the same release from tensions as a male. However, it's not accepted as well when a female swears because it's not considered feminine. It's becoming more of a thing done without thinking. Personally, I think when I hear a girl swearing a lot it sounds so raunchy and gives you an insight into what the girl is like. I think men prefer that women would not swear."

RENEE BRADY
Sophomore

"I don't think they think about it; it's become a natural thing to do. Sometimes they use words to act tough and to release anger but I don't think it's proper. It has become a common practice. They use it around the children and then their children grow up and continue to swear. I don't think it's necessary to swear."

VIKKI HARDY
Sophomore
class treasurer

"I think that teenagers swear for appearances. I think they do it because they think it's one of the ways to get accepted into a crowd. I think others learn it from habit, and like hearing it from parents who swear in anger or emotional upsets. I think if a person can get out her true emotions through swearing and feel better about herself, then she should."

EMIRA WOODS
Sophomore
class president

"I don't think they swear for any particular reason. They swear for the same reasons as men — to get out their frustrations and pent-up feelings. For myself I wouldn't swear as common practice. It shows a lack of intelligence. I think it has become a common thing among women."

CORA HOLLIDAY
Senior
theater

"I think as women got out into the world they had to become more aggressive and act more like men. I think swearing went along with it, but as the 80s have come around women are trying to be business-like and feminine at the same time. Swearing is an injustice to our language. I think swearing will slack off among the women."

LAURA HINKELMAN
band

"Probably why everyone else does. They don't do it intentionally, just out of habit. I think they hear it a lot and they fall into a habit. They think they're cool if they swear. I don't like to hear anyone swear, but society thinks it's all right for men to swear but not women."
