She Talks To Trees; They To Each Other

According to University of Washington researchers who have been working with some willows, trees can communicate. Enough, at least, to warn each other of impending attacks by tent Caterpillars.

No doubt most people learning of this arboreal feat will scoff. Not me. I've been talking to trees for years and getting excellent responses.

When we moved into our present home; there was but one lone tree, a beech, on our two thirds acre.

Gift evergreens from friends and saplings transplanted from a nearby field were augmented with an occasional trip to a nursery of course). Later in the where we gawked about like after from 1d go around kids in a candy shop without patting and stroking (a hugkids in a candy shop without now and then didn't hurt-any money cither) those trees which

I had my eye on one of the young Oriental Planes, probably the fastest-growing quality tree (as opposed to silver maple or poplar) in this part of the country.
