All in the Family

Reinvolve Man in Home? Can't Wait!

In the most recent edition of U.S. News and World Report, Author Peter Stearns (Be a Man! Males in Modern Society) talks about masculine standards and the family role of the male versus his workplace role.

Stearns makes some interesting points; e.g.,

"Males go overboard in the extent which they prove their masculinity by association with spectator sports." Translated, I think this means a man's macho quotient is determined by the number of hours he watches football.

Stearns, though, is mostly concerned with trying to reinvolve a man with his family. He's been displaced, says the author, since the Industrial Revolution.

Stearns thinks a man should get more space back in the house and more power over how it is decorated.

I agree absolutely.

First off, I'm transferring ownership of the kitchen to my husband. I've had it 19 years — more than long enough — and I didn't want it in the first place!

Next, he gets possession of the laundry room and may decorate it anyway he sees fit. (Maybe festoon the walls with all the mateless socks?)

After that, he's welcome to the dining room (I might lay out a dress pattern on the table once a year) and living room (he'll have to relocate the 12-year-old who practices jazz dancing there).

As far as the bedroom goes, he's stuck. I refuse to move out. But, there are still the hallways (filled with sports equipment) and the bathrooms (two showers, three kids: good luck!).

According to Stearns, one of the logical consequences of male involvement with the family would be some good, clean fights over how the house shapes up. I maintain a clean fight never solved anything, but I'm willing to engage in name-calling over the only space left: the sunporch/office. Equipped with a sliding glass door which deadens the noise from the TV and three rock stations turned on at once, it's all that stands between me and insanity.
