'World of James Joyce' To Be Broadcast Tonight

Joyce," PBS, June 15 -Irish television has finally broken into American broadcasting with an exceptional documentary on a fascinating subject, "The World of James Joyce," airing Wednesday, June 15, 8-9:30 p.m. on PBS; at 9 p.m. over Channel 21 in Rochester.

The program was the winner of an international Emmy and shown last year by the now-defunct CBS Cable.

Thanks to South Carolina Educational Television, the program is now being presented for a national audience, although pruned from its original two hours to 90 minutes, and with the addition of an introduction by actor Peter O'Toole, as if Americans needed some validation of Joyce's credentials as an interesting world fig-

Produced by Sean O'Mordha for Radio Telefis Eireann, the documentary is both a portrait of pre-World War I Dublin and the man who wrote about it during his 40 years of self-imposed exile. Rejecting both his Irish and Catholic heritage, Joyce made them the substance of writings which found expression in a kind of stream-of-consciousness that left its mark on contemporary literature.

But you don't have to care a fig about literary matters to find this program worth viewing. It is a very human document about a person who was driven by his background and inclination to deride the conventions of his time and to nurse a deep sense of alienation.

Interweaving the Dublin context with Joyce's life and writings, the documentary succeeds in translating its very/Irish subject into a universal experience, made the more rich by the fullness of its imagery carefully culled from archival sources. There is a great wealth also of interviews made over the years with Joyce's friends and relations.

It is rare for a documentary film to capture the interior world of a man of letters. "The World of James Joyce" accomplishes this sensitively and compassionately. With this distinguished program, RTE has become a welcome addition to the programming resources of American televi-
