What price has our society put on maintaining peace?

MCQUAID

DAN HOLLAND
Senior
play

"I think it has put a pretty high price on it. I think we are trying a lot of things to prevent nuclear war. We might have to sacrifice a lot to stay out of a nuclear war. We might have to sacrifice world privileges and some of our power, but I think we would be willing to compromise to maintain peace. Right now we are not giving out a strong show of force. We are trying to avoid conflict like in the KAL airliner tragedy — we didn't take drastic steps. We'll avoid war at all costs until something directly threatens our country."

JOHN D'SOUZA
Sophomore
camera club

"Our society is putting a lot of importance on peace but too much of its freedom shouldn't be given up for peace. I think we have to go to the point of getting rid of nuclear arms and have some way of checking that other countries do the same thing. Getting rid of these weapons is the bottom line for maintaining peace. It depends on how bad the situation gets before society would forego peace. Society probably would not give up its freedoms before going to war."

DAN PEACOCK
football

"I think generally to most people peace is the most important thing to achieve but there are those who want power so peace isn't that important to them. We have to do everything there is to maintain peace and if that comes to giving up some freedom we have to do it. A lot of people wouldn't want to lose freedom but we must be able to see both sides of the picture and understand what will happen if we don't — mutual destruction"

"I think society wants peace and no wars and might give up some freedoms but not all to maintain peace. I wouldn't give up our nuclear defenses. That just would make our enemies stronger. I don't think we should spend so many millions of dollars on nuclear arms but we shouldn't give them up either."

TIM JUDSON
Senior
cross country

"I think society has put a pretty high price on peace. Everyone is trying to maintain it and everybody wants it but society isn't exactly doing what it should be doing to achieve it. Society isn't working in the right direction. Everybody is worried about disarmament when they should be working to regulate the arms. I believe that since the invention of nuclear weapons there is no way that they are going to become interlocking, and you can't have bilateral disarmament because you won't know if other countries are storing them. I think people would fight for their freedoms before working for peace."

ROB NEMES
Senior
yearbook staff

"I think society has put a pretty high price on peace. With the recent anti-nuclear demonstrations there is no doubt that people want peace. I don't know if banning nuclear weapons will bring that peace. I don't think that getting rid of nuclear arms alone will bring peace. There also has to be a better understanding between different ideologies of the world and between Russia and the United States. I think people are more interested in their freedoms than maintaining peace."

MARK ZLOTNIK
football

"I don't think it puts enough emphasis on peace. The price should be limitation of nuclear arms. Society should go as far as it has to to maintain peace because once there is a war there will be no stopping the destruction. The bottom line for maintaining peace would be negotiations. I don't think society should give up its freedoms but there has to be some way to negotiate."

MIKE ROMANO
student government

"I think society puts great importance on having peace. No one wants a nuclear war. Even the Russians know they will be destroyed even if they have more weapons. I think we have to stop producing the nuclear weapons, put a freeze on them, and have everyone work together to maintain peace. I think we will have to compromise. We might have to take the first step and then if other countries really want peace they will do the same."
