All in the Family

Vive La Difference? Maybe Not

Our son, "the French student," boarded a plane recently with some 20 other young Francophiles to study the language, culture and history of France. They would land in Brussels, go to Paris and later to Fontainebleau to stay with various families.

I turned around to give him one last wave goodbye and thought how All-American he looked in his blue jeans, Levi's jacket and indoor soccer shoes.

Before agreeing to the trip, arranged by the high school French Department and led by teacher Eleanor Perry and her husband, we had discussed the benefits.

Knowing our son, it was unlikely he would become more fluent. But, on the other hand, the opportunity to visit Normandy, the Loire Valley, Paris and Fontainebleau was a chance of a lifetime. So we paid the money and signed a permission slip allowing him to drink wine with meals, as is the custom for young people in that country.

We followed his itinerary via the schedule left with us and shortly after they had left Paris and had arrived in Fontainebleau to stay with their families, we called him on the telephone.

Everything was "awesome," our son reported. Paris was wonderful: He and a couple of friends had got lost taking the Metro (subway) out of town, but they had hopped another one and got back to their hotel before curfew. They'd visited the Louvre and seen the Mona Lisa, driven past the Moulin Rouge and had gone to the Tour Eiffel and Arc de Triomphe. Best of all was shopping in the little shops along the Champs Elysee where one of the girls who had visited France before taught them to barter.

"None of us wanted to leave Paris," he said. "When it was time to go we cried and kissed and hugged each other." I looked at my husband. "Sounds like there was a little cultural wine drinking involved."

Our son went on. His French parents were marvelous. The mother had had a birthday and he and his roommate, Jeff, had bought her a teapot and cups and wished her "bon anniversaire." He also was speaking French to the hosts' three sons, none of whom spoke English.

We were impressed and as the days stretched on we became more excited as other communiques from the travelers filtered through to us.

We went to pick him up at the airport at the appointed time. Half of the kids had been able to get an earlier flight home from New York. So it was only a small group which straggled off the plane.

Our son was about the fourth or fifth kid to hove into sight.

"Oh, my God," one of us said, not at all reverently. He still wore the blue jeans but the Levi's jacket had been replaced with his beige dress jacket. On his head, tilted to one side was a white linen-like fedora. A gold chain about his throat completed the image.

Not until the next morning did we discover that he also had a hole in his left ear. (A fellow student had pierced it with the earring which she then lent to him.)

He left for school the next day dressed in black with hat and earring.

My husband and I tried to be philosophical. Sometimes you get more than you pay for.

What do you tell a Mormon missionary?

Ever more frequently does the Catholic find at his door a bright young Mormon missionary eager to pose disturbing questions about the Catholic religion. Questions many practicing Catholics find difficult to answer. But now Father William Taylor, an Idaho Catholic priest raised as a Mormon, has written a fascinating paperback book comparing the two faiths.
