What dictates a person's drive for success?

CARDINAL MOONEY

LOU BIECK
Senior

"I don't think people want to be successful just to be successful. They have to be successful in order to raise a family especially with the cost of housing and food. Some of the motivation for success might be greed and power but most people need to be successful for the monetary value."

JOAN BARONE
Senior National Honor Society

"I think it is a combination of things but the root of wanting to be successful is in the individual. You have to want to be successful or you won't be motivated to do things. Other things like peer pressure and environmental circumstances dictate the drive for success but basically it is a person's need for self-fulfillment."

RALPH DeSTEPHANO
Junior

"It is greed and power because I think people want to show others how much better they are than them. People want wealth and to show it off. There is a growing tendency in our society to get ahead no matter what the cost because the idea is that if you are not successful you are nothing. Today's society demands success."

DOUG GOLDING
Junior
assistant business manager of yearbook

"It depends on the person. People have different reasons for wanting success — self-fulfillment, self-satisfaction, a need to be someone. Society also generates the need to be successful in order to support families. It is definitely a tendency in our society to get ahead no matter what. I think success is important but not at all costs."

TOM GRECO
Senior
Student Council president

"I think it is a combination of motives but primarily it is self-fulfillment. People have to feel they are successful before they can go out and be a success in achieving their goals. Success is necessary. No matter whether a person is rich or poor it is important that person feel successful."

LAURA SPOONHOWER
Sophomore soccer

"I think it's a combination of things that make people want to be successful — self-fulfillment, social pressures from peers and also the need to be successful. People definitely need to be successful because then there are no regrets about not having tried to achieve their goals. It is good to strive for success."
