another and love one another," she said. "When I think of how many beautiful people and dedicated teachers have worked so hard for that school over the years, it's sad."

Carol Lindsey, whose daughter will enter seventh grade at Wayland Central School next year, thinks the parish may have "jumped ship too fast."

"I can't help but think there may have been some other options to keep at least the seventh grade there," she said. "We really believe in Catholic education . . . Prayer in school is as important to me as computer time or having an extra language. Sure, they're going to need that in college, but they will also need their faith when they go out and live in the world?"

Lindsey and other parents of seventh- and eighth-graders considered sending their children to St. Mary's in Dansville. Since St. Mary's is only seven miles away, busing would have been provided by the public school district.

But for most parents — particularly those with seventh-graders — the advantages of Catholic education simply didn't outweigh the disadvantages of sending their children to new schools twice in a period of one or two years.

Curriculum was also a stiff deterrent for Wayland students considering attending the Dansville school. Because students at Wayland Central begin several sequential courses in the seventh grade, parents were concerned that students who transferred in the eighth grade might suffer a disadvantage.

Father Schancky's financial proposal has softened but not relieved the disappointment Schumbmehl, Lindsey and others feel over the loss of the two upper grades.

"I hope this helps to heal the sadness, not just among parents, but among the parishioners as well," Lindsey said. "The school is a real, living part of this parish. People are afraid to lose it."
