

Work camp

Installing a new ceiling wasn't a job that any of the crew members had tried before, but with advice from a hardware store clerk and the help of a reference book or two, the group finished the new ceiling by Friday afternoon.

Another team headed by the Rev. Hubbard spent Thursday and Friday at St. John's Church assembling a wooden ramp for the handicapped. The week's worth of experience was evident in the comfortable, steady way Harold Clark, 17, and Danny Johnson, 18, worked together, depending on an intuitive sense of comradeship rather than a lot of discussion to determine who should do what and how.

Before each team finished its work at a site, one member sat down with the owner of the home and recorded an oral history. "You lose a lot of your stereotyped images of poor people — that they're all lonely or depressed," said

Tami Hubbard, 18. "These people are making it ... They have a lot of hope, even when they're dirt broke."

Most of the team members live in Canandaigua, but they didn't return to their homes at night. Instead, they headed down the west side of Canandaigua Lake to Camp Onanda. There they spent evenings on a hillside overlooking the lake, eating dinner, singing and sharing the day's experiences, then retiring in tents to rest for the following day.

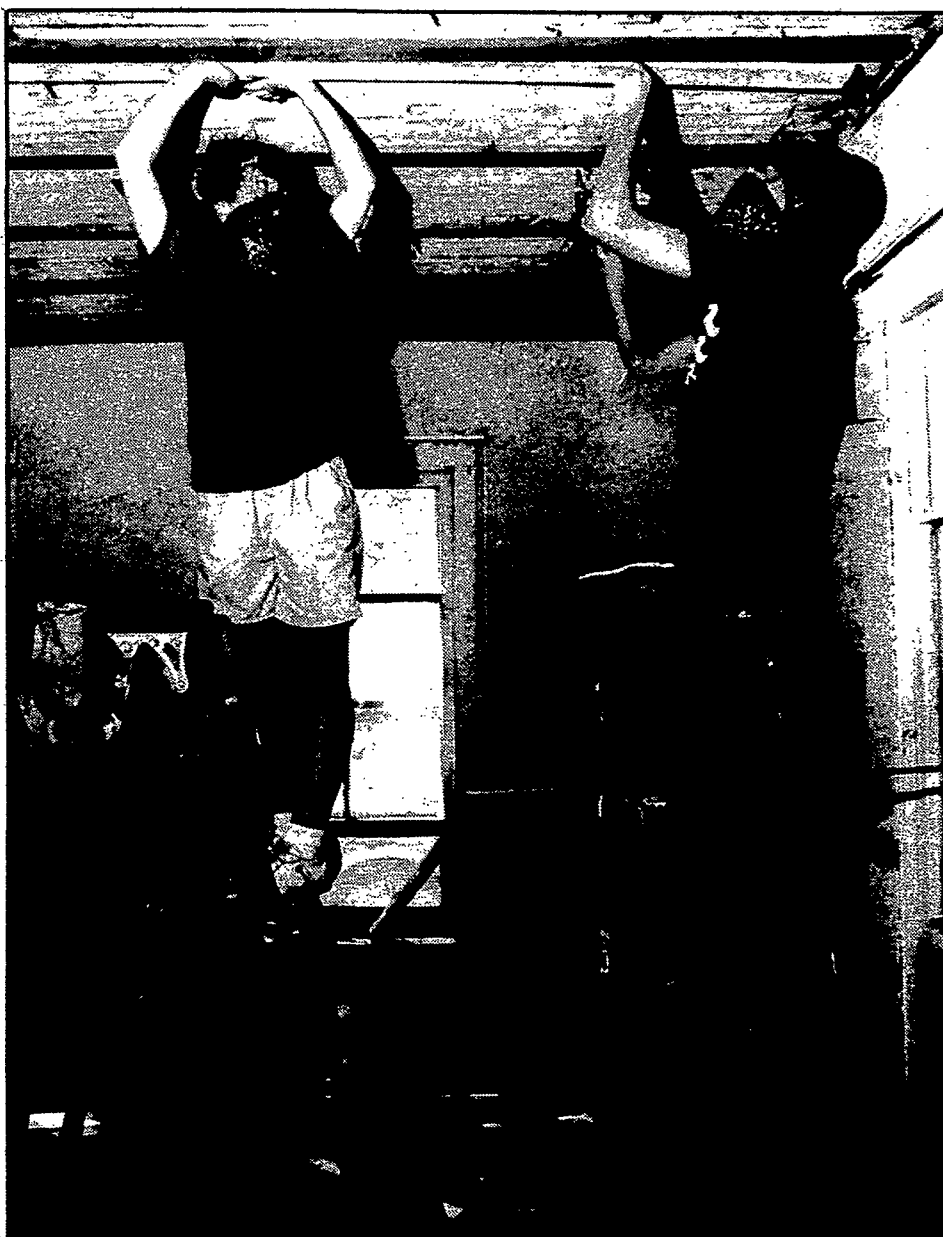

"We wanted to live together in Christian community," explained Carol Ann Hubbard. "When you're out there roughing it together, you come to depend on each other."

Each morning, the Company of Strangers preceded their labors with a eucharistic celebration. At the time of the offering, however, they broke off and went out to work. Each evening, when the day's "offering" was complete, they continued the service.

"That way, our whole day was the Eucharist," Hubbard said. "I think it made us more fully understand what faith is all about."

The pride of workmanship shines through grime and sweat on the faces of Keith Weaver, 15 (left), Kent Kikka, 28 (center), and Tami Hubbard, 18.

Two weeks ago, the ceiling in Tina McGuire's front room collapsed during a violent storm. Members of a Company of Strangers work crew pulled down the remainder of the ceiling last Thursday and installed new tile the following day.
