and everything else we've done has served its purpose. Reaction (from neighborhood residents) has been extremely favorable."

Father Mulligan said the diocese will now investigate several options — including the possibility of legal action — to resolve the matter.

Legal challenges on grounds that the landmark designation violates constitutional guarantees of due process and separation of church and state are also being considered but only as a last resort, the priest said.

Diocesan attorney Stephen Kruk was unavailable for comment.

"The parish is the key decision maker here," Father Mulligan said. "Certainly (legal action) would be considered."

The priest said he hoped a decision on what avenue to pursue would be made by the end of the month. "(Legal action) is not the first option we'd jump at but at this point we don't want to rule anything out."

McCartney, however, questioned a legal challenge on behalf of the parish.

"There are no (legal) grounds as I can see," he said. "It's not a religious building; it's a vacated building."

The possibility of a lawsuit concerns Father William B. Leone, pastor of Holy Redeemer/St. Francis Xavier, who said such action would only be delaying the inevitable.

"I'm tired of it," he said. "I'm not looking for anything of that nature. I was ready to close the book on it right after the public hearing last month — secure it, board it up and move for demolition of the other two buildings."

Father Leone said he was somewhat surprised by the lopsided voting by both the city planning commission and preservation board. "It might be a losing battle," he remarked. "If those 15 people represent Rochester — and they want the building to stand — then I hope they're going to come through with some bucks."

The parish announced last fall that it could no longer afford the nearly $10,000 a year in insurance and other costs to maintain the vacant property. The parcel also includes a rectory, heating plant and a school building.

The Rochester City School District has expressed interest in the school, but concern has been raised as to whether the state would approve the district's use of the school unless the ground on which the vacated church stands were available for recreation or other purposes.
