her (Weems) as a witness, especially since the counsel for the plaintiff has tried to shield her identity all along."

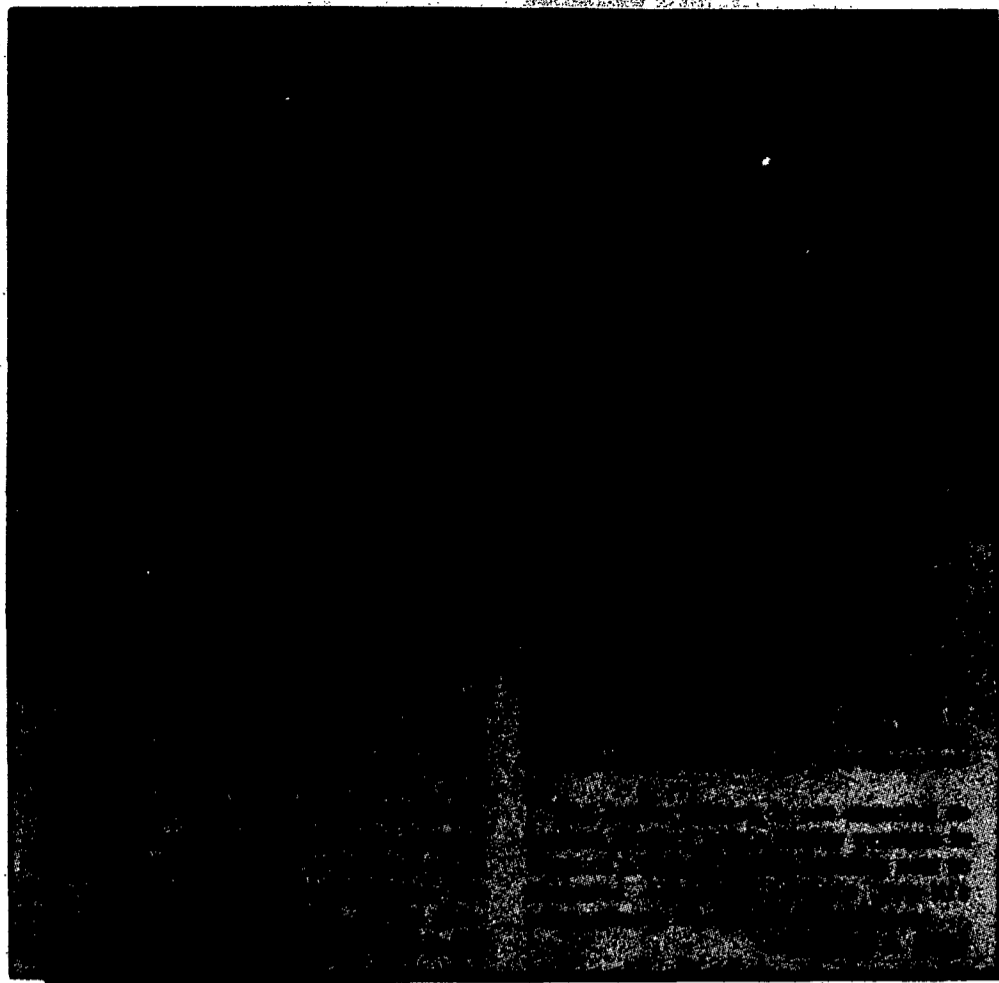

Although Parker said Weems' testimony didn't turn out to be damaging to the defendants' case, the hospital attorney said that through the re-enactment she was simply "trying to illustrate the excessive degree of the behavior of the protesters."

"This behavior was beyond what is lawful, and we can't allow that to happen on hospital grounds," Parker said. "I felt that it was good that the judge heard what he heard. Behavior like that can't be tolerated."

After the trial adjourned, Father Mugavero said he was relieved that the proceeding was over and added that he would be "surprised if the judge made a quick decision."

"I feel good to have gone through the process of trying the legal system," the priest said. "My feelings about what exactly took place ... go way beyond what the legal system would allow."

Throughout the trial, Parker had emphasized that the Genesee Hospital took legal action neither to condone abortion nor in an attempt to restrict freedom of speech. In its pursuit of a permanent restraining order against anti-abortion protesters, Parker said, the hospital is looking to "restrict picketing so that the protests do not interfere with hospital operations."
