nouncement. When asked about sanctions during a trip to southern Africa in 1988, the pope said he favored solutions that were "not imposed," but said he recognized that sanctions are sometimes morally defensible.

The Vatican's emphasis on a peaceful evolution in South Africa underscored another moral dilemma posed by apartheid. Mandela and the ANC have held that armed struggle is still a legitimate part of their program, as long as violence remains a tool of government repression. The congress says the limited use of violence in such circumstances is self-defense.

The pope, asked about this in 1988, said he understood how those oppressed by apartheid could turn to violence, but that "from a moral point of view it is not a solution that one wishes to propose."

In an afternoon press conference on the day of his conversation with the pope, Mandela said "the pope indicated that although as a church they could not impose sanctions, they were putting moral pressure to induce the South African government to abandon apartheid."

"That is what we expected and nothing more," he said.

Mandela said that "it is premature to ask ourselves Catholic, we should be acting in consistence with Catholic teaching."

He also discussed voters' options when all candidates in a given race support abortion rights.

"In good conscience, one could refrain from voting altogether. In some instances, this might be best, even though voting is normally a moral obligation," he said.

The cardinal's statement defended the U.S. bishops' recent decision to hire a public-relations firm to conduct a campaign against abortion.

The effort is a way for the church "to get the truth out," Cardinal O'Connor said. "That's precisely the reason. The fact is that we don't read and hear enough about abortion in the media," he said.

"Fairness in reporting on pro-life issues is imperative," he said. "Some courageous journalists — even some who disagree with the pro-life position — have made the effort to report in an unbiased manner. It is hoped that a professional communications campaign will encourage many more journalists to do the same."

Addressing those in the media, he said that "I know the majority of you want to publicize the truth in all things. I know, too, that a number of you do your best to publish the truth about the unborn."

"I am baffled, therefore, to read that 85 percent and more of people in the media are 'pro-choice,'" the cardinal said. "Perhaps that finding is simply not true. But if you are, wouldn't it be honest to say so when you are reporting on a story about abortion?" he asked.
