Doctors say pope resting after surgery

By John Thavis
Catholic News Service

ROME — Doctors said Pope John Paul II was recovering well from a thigh bone fracture and reconstructive surgery, but would need several weeks before fully resuming his duties.

"The pope is in good general condition, and I found him in great humor," Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said April 30, the day after the pontiff's two-hour operation.

On May 2, the spokesman said the pope continued to improve and was beginning muscle-toning exercises in bed. "The patient is calm and serene," he said.

In a tape-recorded Sunday blessing May 1, the pope said he was sorry the accident forced him to postpone a planned trip to Sicily and miss the rest of the African synod.

"The designs of divine providence are truly mysterious!" he said, his voice somewhat weaker than normal.

In the days following the surgery, the pope met regularly with top aides in his hospital room to review a revised schedule for coming months. He was expected to remain in Rome's Gemelli hospital for two-three weeks.

The pope, who celebrates his 74th birthday May 18, fell getting out of the bathtub late April 28, breaking the right thigh bone close to the hip. Doctors replaced the head of the bone, where it fits into the hip, with a metal prosthesis.

Navarro-Valls said the fall was a common mishap and he ruled out fainting or dizziness as the cause. Doctors said they did not plan any further medical tests on the pope, who was expected to make a full recovery.

According to members of Gemelli's medical team, the pope would wait about 10 days before taking his first steps — being careful not to put too much weight on the right leg.

He was to use a walker at first, then proceed to crutches and, later, a cane. The point at which the cane becomes unnecessary depends much on the individual, but doctors said they were optimistic about Pope John Paul's recuperative powers.

"In July he can go to the mountains and walk, but he certainly cannot ski. It would be good if he did some swimming instead, because the prosthesis needs muscle tone in order to function," said Dr. Gianfranco Fineschi, who performed the surgery.

Fineschi said the operation had gone "more perfectly than one could imagine." The bone head was replaced with a long-life part as opposed to a cemented replacement that lasts only 10 years, and which is routinely used in patients over the age of 80.

The pope's accident interrupted a particularly heavy schedule of papal activities. He was to have left April 29 for a weekend trip to Sicily; instead, thousands of people gathered at the papal meeting site to pray for the pope's health.

He also was forced to miss the final week of the African synod. He would have missed a meeting of the world's cardinals May 9-10, but the meeting was rescheduled for June 13-14 so the pope could preside.

The pope's recovery was not expected to affect papal events planned for later in the year, including an October trip to the United Nations and three U.S. cities.
