When advanced placement tests are right around the corner, finding some free time can be as much of a struggle as the exams themselves.

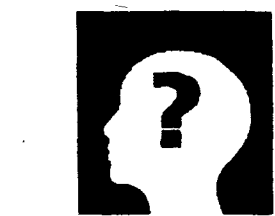

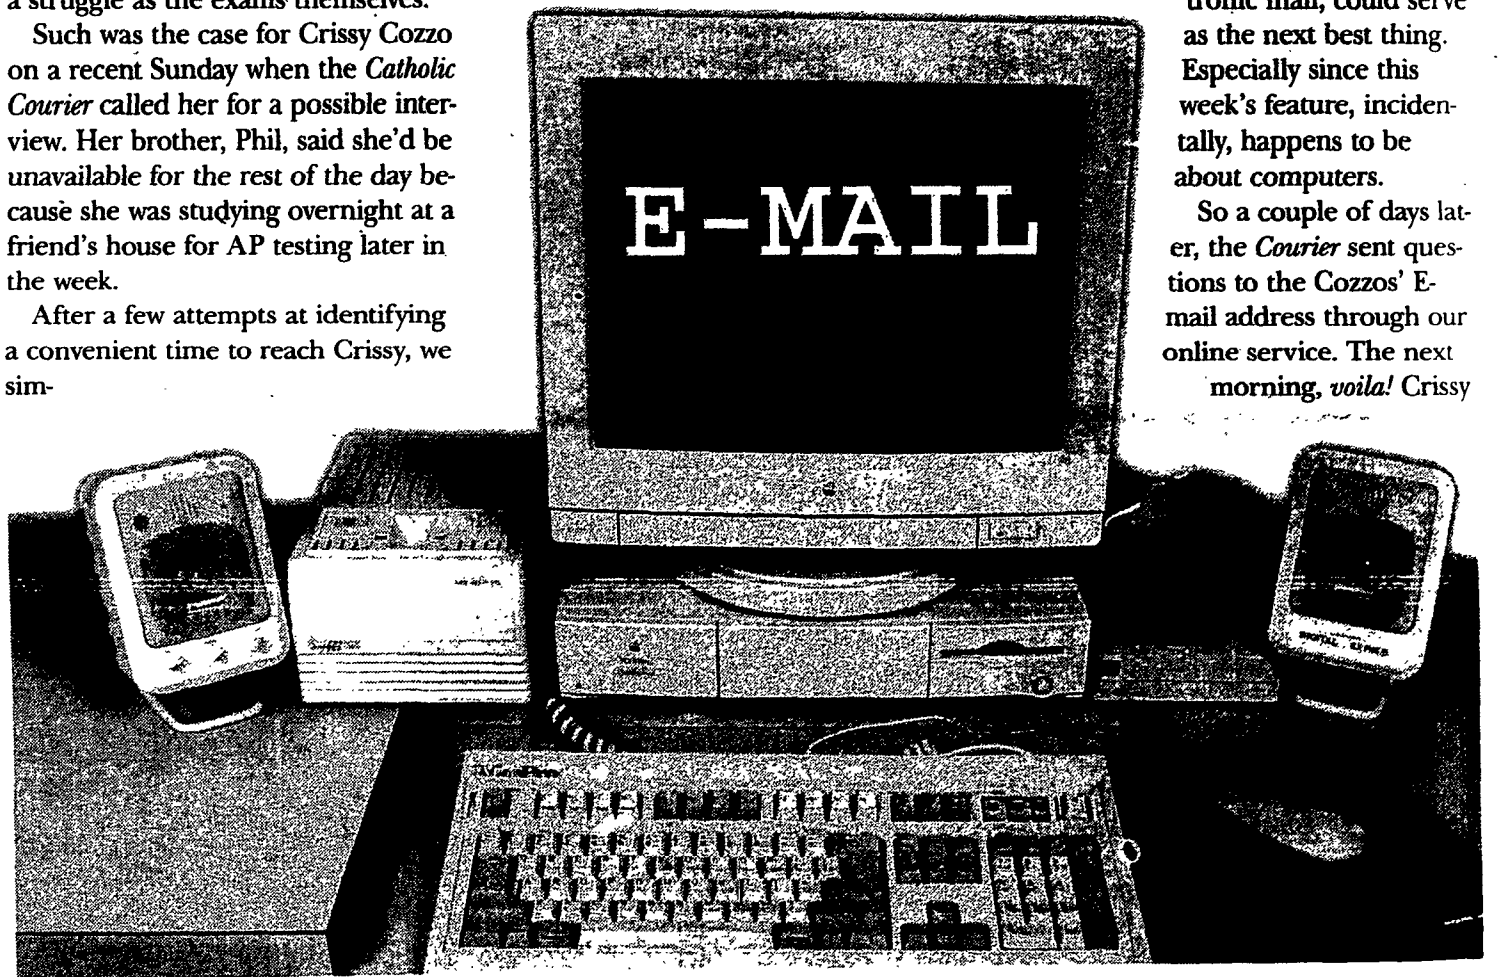

Such was the case for Crissy Cozzo on a recent Sunday when the Catholic Courier called her for a possible interview. Her brother, Phil, said she'd be unavailable for the rest of the day because she was studying overnight at a friend's house for AP testing later in the week.

After a few attempts at identifying a convenient time to reach Crissy, we simply said we'd try back later in the week. Then, just before hanging up, Phil made a brief and intriguing suggestion.

"Do you want our E-mail address?" Hey, now we're talking. When a reporter and an interviewee aren't available at the same time, maybe an interview via E-mail, or electronic mail, could serve as the next best thing. Especially since this week's feature, incidentally, happens to be about computers.

So a couple of days later, the Courier sent questions to the Cozzos' E-mail address through our online service. The next morning, voila! Crissy had typed in her answers and E-mailed them back. Interview completed — without a single word spoken — via the Internet.

E-mailing is just one of many options available on the wildly popular Internet, where computer users go "online" to gain access to people and information all over the world. This composite of computer networks is commonly referred to as the "information superhighway."

Overall, computers are becoming today what television was in the 1950s — if you don't have one by now, you're in the minority. And while nobody says you have to own a computer, sooner or later you may wonder what you're missing out on.

"Time for a cliché: 'Computers are the wave of the future,'" Crissy commented. "Not only will they help me through college in the same way that I use them now, but with all the new technology, they will definitely be used as educational aids."
