Churches make Rochester airwaves

By Mike Latona Staff Writer

ROCHESTER – A growing number of Rochester churches are deciding they're ready for prime time.

Television ads promoting both Catholic and non-Catholic churches, which first aired in July, have been brought back by popular demand on WHEC-TV 10. Catholic parishes featured so far include Blessed Sacrament, Sacred Heart Cathedral and St. Anne, all in Rochester; and St. John the Evangelist in Greece.

Several more ads and featured churches are planned for the upcoming year, said Christine Sibilio, WHEC's research director. Each series will run 10-14 days.

"They have precipitated a greater response than we expected," Sibilio said. "We've heard back from some of the churches and they said they've had increased attendance and financial contributions."

Sibilio said the idea originated with Father Bruce Ammering, pastor at Rochester's Blessed Sacrament Church.

"Once after Mass he asked me, 'Christine, you work at Channel 10. How much would it cost to advertise?" recalled Sibilio, a Blessed Sacrament parishioner and lector

Pam Fargnoli, Blessed Sacrament's assistant administrator, added that Father Ammering wanted to promote Catholic parishes on TV because other denominations were doing it.

"He saw that the Mormon Church put its ads on all the time and said, "Why can't they do that for the Catholic churches?" Fargnoli said.

Sibilio made some inquiries at Channel 10, and the result was an ad produced by the station. It starts out showing a young adult couple and a close-up of their toddler, with a voice-over saying:

"In his life there are going to be many directions he can take – lots of decisions, even moral challenges. There are going to be questions that you just can't answer for him. How will you prepare him?"

In the commercial's second part, the family is greeted in a church doorway. Finally, three church exteriors are shown and identified as the voice-over concludes:

"There are some answers. Why not start now? Make the decision. Visit a church this weekend."

The full-length commercial lasts 30 seconds. A 10-second version has also run frequently. The ad, except for the exterior shots, was shot at Blessed Sacrament. The original commercial featured St. Paul's Episcopal, Sacred Heart and Lutheran Word of the Incarnate churches.

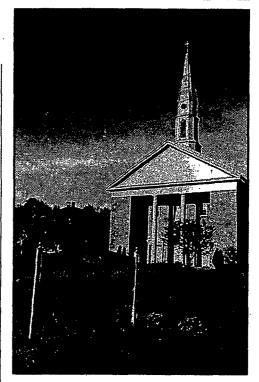

In December, St. Anne, St. Thomas Episcopal and Higher Heights Church of God were highlighted; in January, Blessed Sacrament, Greece's St. John the Evangelist and Genesee Valley United Methodist were featured.

Sibilio said that a young adult family was profiled in the commercial because her research revealed that this would be the most crucial audience to reach. These people, she said, frequently "don't go to church every week, or maybe they just go at Christmas and Easter."

Father Joseph D'Aurizio, pastor at St. John the Evangelist, supported that notion, saying that attracting this age group was a primary reason his parish decided to become part of this television advertising campaign.

"This says in effect, we've got to get young people interested," Father D'Aurizio said. "A lot of people are no longer active in the practice of their faith."

Sibilio said that the commercials generally air when young adults are mostly likely to be home and watching TV — either during the morning news, or in the late afternoon and prime time.

The latest series of ads concluded Jan. 24. Fargnoli said that Blessed Sacrament Church covered all expenses for last summer's ads, and that the costs are now shared by all participating churches.

The inclusion of non-Catholic denominations was a goal of Blessed Sacrament's from the beginning, Fargnoli said.

"We have, in the past, tried to be a little more ecumenical here," she remarked.

Sibilio added that several additional churches have called her, asking to become involved in future commercials. Any denomination is eligible, she said, as long as the other participating churches approve.

Sibilio has arranged for Channel 10 to absorb production costs, and also for churches to get substantially reduced rates. In general, she noted, TV advertising for local churches has not been widespread because "it's very cost-prohibitive." Though she declined to give specific rates, Sibilio said that a 30-second spot in prime time ordinarily costs thousands of dollars.

Obituary

Biblical instructor dies in Israel

A memorial service for Daniel W. Casey Jr., was scheduled for Jan. 25 at St. Monica's Church, Rochester. He died in Jerusalem Jan. 9, 2000, at the age of 52.

Professor Casey, as friends say he liked to be known, was ordained a priest in 1975 for the Syracuse Diocese but had resigned. He had just finished leading a tour of Israel earlier in the week he died.

. He was a scholar in residence at the Tantur Ecumenical Institute in Jerusalem, where he had spent six months in each of the past few years. He also had offered workshops and seminars in Rochester-area churches on the subjects of biblical archaeology and women in the Bible.

"Dan's specialty was biblical women, especially in the Dead Sea Scrolls," said Father Bob Gaudio, a classmate from the St. Bernard's Seminary class of 1973.

Professor Casey lived at St. Monica's several years ago while studying in Rochester, when Father Gaudio was pastor of St. Monica's. "He helped people see the dignity in these women in Scripture and their role through biblical history," his friend observed.

Services took place Jan. 21 at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Syracuse.
