LAW COULD IMPROVE FACMEMORICER DIGHTS

WASHINGTON (CNS)-The lives of immigrant farm workers, who make up more than half of the 1.8 million U.S. agricultural workers, could be improved under a proposed law that could legalize their status, speakers said Feb. 23 during the annual Catholic Social Ministry Gathering in Washington. The bill is supported by a bipartisan coalition in both houses of Congress but could be scuttled by its congressional opponents, according to J. Kevin Appleby, director of migration policy for the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services. Under the bill — known as the Agricultural Job Opportunity, Benefits and Security Act of 2003 (S. 1645/H.R. 3142) - any undocumented agricultural worker who can show evidence of having worked at least 100 days in 2002 and 2003 will gain temporary legal status. For permanent residency, workers must work 360 days in agriculture over the next six years.

Also, growers would have fewer hurdles in bringing in immigrants to do agricultural work. Farm workers would be able to come and go between the United States and their home country, and also would have access to the federal courts to sue if they believe their rights in the workplace have been violated. Catholic Charities in the Diocese of Rochester, N.Y., in conjunction with the Diocese of Rochester's Public Policy Committee, declared promotion of this bill its top 2004 public-policy priority.

The bill was promoted in parishes during 'Public Policy Weekend," a new annual diocesan initiative that took place Feb. 7-8. That weekend, all diocesan parishes were asked to take part in a petition-signing campaign to support the bill. Almost 7,000 parishioners from throughout the diocese signed the petitions, according to diocesan social-ministry advocates. According to Marvin Mich, director of social policy and research at Catholic Family Center in Rochester, copies of the petitions were taken to members of Congress last week by diocesan representatives attending the social-ministry gathering.
